Canada needs pollinator strategy: York researchers

Canada's wild pollinators are in decline and without a national pollinator plan, many species could be heading for extinction, like the endangered rusty-patched bumblebee or the American bumblebee, according to researchers at York University. Although the focus is usually on managed honey bees, unlike wild pollinators, they are not native to Canada, not adapted to this country's weather or plants and not at-risk of extinction, says the researchers. Wild pollinators are essential to Canada's economy, food security and ecosystems, but about 30 species, including eight bee species, are listed under Canada's Species at Risk Act.

Congratulations to MPPAL student Prince for securing a position with the Ontario Ministry of the Solicitor General

Congratulations to MPPAL student Prince for securing a position with the Ontario Ministry of the Solicitor General. Prince Emmanuel Adjin-Tettey, Class of 2023, Business Analyst Ministry of the Solicitor General, enrolled into MPPAL with the sole aim of diversifying and broadening my horizon after more than a decade as an IT/Telecom specialist. He wanted to gain the acumen for public policy analysis. He says the MPPAL program has given him more than he expected. He landed a co-op position as research analyst at the Ministry of Infrastructure through the MPPAL program. After applying the research and public policy skills acquired from the program, he was offered a position as Business and Information Analyst in the Broadband and Data Analytics Unit, even before the successful completion of his co-op. He recently moved to the Ministry of the Solicitor General as a Business Analyst with a much broader portfolio.
