ORU Description and History:

The York Centre for Asian Research (YCAR) fosters and supports research at York related to Asia (South, East and Southeast in particular) and Asian Diasporas. It continues the strong tradition of internationally recognized research in Asian studies pioneered since 1974 by the University of Toronto-York University Joint Centre for Asia Pacific Studies, in which York faculty members and graduate students played a central role. It became an independent unit in 1992 and has been growing rapidly ever since under York's Vice-President Research and Innovation (VPRI) with strong memberships from faculty and students whose network reaches both local and global communities. The Centre has over 250 faculty, student and community associates from all disciplines and Faculties, and it fosters cross-disciplinary thematic research on Asia and Asian diasporas from historical and contemporary perspectives.

YCAR aims to provide:

- 1) Intellectual Exchange: facilitating interaction between Asia-focused scholars at York, and between York researchers and a global community of Asia scholars;
- 2) Research Support: assisting in the development of external research grants, and administering such projects;
- 3) Graduate Training: supporting graduate student training and research by creating an interdisciplinary intellectual hub, administering a graduate diploma program, and providing financial support for graduate research;
- 4) Knowledge Mobilization: providing a clear public point of access to York's collective research expertise on Asia and ensuring the wider dissemination of York research on Asia to academic and non-academic audiences in Canada and around the world.
